Well, I think it's like a one million question. We really don't know how they will be, but we can speculate a little bit and we can rely on the on the changes that we are experiencing right now. I'm trying to speculate a little bit on that. But one of the things that we are really feeling right now is that students need to believe that their learning experience is useful in order to engage on that. That's why I think all around the world there are experiences where students don't come to the university. They don't want to go to the university, they prefer to be at home or doing other things because they are not feeling that the learning experience at university is as useful as it should be. And the, the, the COVID situation the pandemic situation, stress that that difference they, they. but they have learned during that process at home. And so they expect that if they go to the university, the experience should be much better or at least better than if they are at home. So that's one of the things that I think it will happen. The experience, either face-to-face or even online should be a thing that students really give value. So I think that will be a great expectation from them. A few years ago, we as teachers believed that we just have to go and talk to the students and explain our knowledge and talk about our knowledge and they will be interested on that. Okay, I think that's not enough. And I really believe that's not enough because we are not doing everything we may do for a better learning process. They will ask or they will demand for experiences that can be more or less ubiquitous. They can be on the bus and they can be learning something or they can be at home or if they have time they can learn in different places. But that's, that's not an easy process for, for the teachers to create that kind of materials and experiences. So, I think we will have to learn a lot on this process. Humans want to learn if they believe it is important for them. So it is a part of our job as teachers to create that expectation or to create experiences like that. that expectation or to create experiences like that.
